Corticosteroids are potent anti-inflammatory agents, whose use in the treatment of heart failure has been initiated during the past decade. They have been employed since the 1970s in the treatment of acute myocardial infarction, with less evidence available in the treatment of ischemic cardiomyopathy. The results are mixed, but many experts currently consider that their use is associated with a lower mortality in this subgroup of heart failure patients. There is also evidence that chronic treatment with long acting forms is associated with a better outcome in chronic heart failure patients. The use of corticosteroids in cardiomyopathies must be limited to specific groups, since the majority of studies show they are associated with adverse effects, which can be life threatening in this subgroup of patients. Current studies have attempted to compare the use of short acting corticosteroids and placebo in heart failure, with the results varying depending on the study. The use of corticosteroids in heart failure remains controversial.Dosing regimen of dacarbazine in the treatment of advanced melanoma. Ninety-nine evaluable patients with advanced malignant melanoma entered a randomized trial comparing doses of dacarbazine given as a fixed daily dose or as a variable dose schedule. The group treated with the fixed daily dose of 200 mg/m² of dacarbazine had a median survival time of 41 weeks compared with 27 weeks in the group treated with a variable dosing schedule. An approximate dose-response relationship was seen between these two groups. Although the frequency of side-effects was not significantly different, a tendency for a better treatment response was seen in the group treated with the variable dose. The proportion of partial remissions was 25 per cent and the proportion of objective remissions 6 per cent.Q: Does an app with a dedicated database require server?
